Tina worried about many things, such as contracting illnesses from classmates, world events in the news, being on time for scheduled activities, getting everything right at school, and her mother forgetting to pick her up as planned (which had never happened). She complained daily of stomachaches, headaches, and neck and leg pain. She picked at her cuticles, and had difficulty falling asleep because of worrying. She often went to her parents in the middle of the night because of a nightmare or physical complaint. Tina had always been anxious and nervous and needed constant reassurance.

Anxiety disorders are the most common psychiatric disorders, in adults as well as in children and adolescents. Because these disorders often have their onset in childhood, they can have lifelong effects on health, productivity, and quality of life. The lower image and text are from Rynn et al. whose study on venlafaxine in the treatment of children and adolescents with generalized anxiety disorder appears in this issue (p. 290). The upper image is courtesy of the Anxiety Disorders Association of America, a national organization dedicated to advancing treatment, education and research about anxiety disorders and comorbid conditions and improving the lives of all who suffer from them.
